Inolvidable offers a glimpse into the world of a person with Alzheimer's who tries to hold onto their memories despite feeling that things are progressively becoming unclear. It narrates the love story of a woman who, amidst internal chaos and her attempts to complete a puzzle for which she no longer has all the pieces, clings to the memory of her deceased husband, showing us how oblivion can trap us within a labyrinth with no escape, where the landscape becomes increasingly confusing and the inability to remember, to think, to be... comes to rob us of our essence, to the point of making us complete strangers within our own existence. Likewise, the composition invites reflection, prompting us to consider how vulnerable we are when deprived of our memories, how overwhelming and terrifying it is to feel that day after day, we lose a part of ourselves, and have no control over what happens.
